Founded in 1969 by Thomas N. Hendrickson, CPAC was originally named Computerized Pollution Abatement Corporation. In 1981, the company went public and shortened its name to CPAC. (Stock is traded under the symbol CPAK.)

While it continues today as a manufacturer of its original product of “silver recovery” equipment, the company has expanded to include other imaging products as well as diversifying into the cleaning and personal care products industry with the 1994 acquisition of The Fuller Brush Company. The CPAC Imaging segment of the company develops and markets imaging chemicals, equipment, and supplies at seven business units worldwide. The Fuller Brands segment manufactures commercial, industrial, and household cleaning products, as well as custom brushes and personal care lines. Long range plans include acquisitions and strategic alliances that will serve to strengthen both segments of the business.

President and CEO Thomas Hendrickson recently stated, “Over the years, I have had the pleasure to work with many talented, energetic, creative, and dedicated people whose quality efforts have helped CPAC become the business it is today.”
